

Partner Catherine Brennan comments for Bloomberg Law on Colorado bank-fintech partnership settlement

August 19, 2020 |

On August 18, Colorado filed a settlement with online lenders and their bank partners, resolving allegations that their lending arrangements violated state usury limits.

Bloomberg Law reported that the safe harbor included in the agreement will now allow loans issued by a bank-fintech partnership to charge up to 36% interest, which is above Colorado's existing usury limits but below rates some online lenders charge. According to Bloomberg, the settlement could be a model for other states that wish to regulate fintech partnerships with banks, which are generally exempt from state usury limits beyond the state where they're headquartered.

Hudson Cook Partner Catherine Brennan told Bloomberg that the settlement may attract new bank-fintech lender partnerships to Colorado. "Colorado has long been on the list of states to avoid" due to the state's tough stance on fintech partnerships, she said. Catherine noted that the settlement combines existing case law and many standard operating provisions already in use in most bank-fintech partnerships.
